

The Regenerative Earth Summit: Food + Climate + Culture is about the ground we walk on and the planet we call home.

It is an invitation to the organic, non-GMO, and emergent regenerative food and agriculture movement, the soil carbon sequestration community and the local food movement. By joining together, we can create a positive revolution in how humans work cooperatively to bring healthy, nutritious foods to our communities, work in tandem with earth's life support systems to sequester carbon, and learn how to share one planet with millions of other species.

November 6 - 7, 2017
Sustainability, Energy and Environment Complex
University of Colorado, Boulder

For participants, the Summit designed as a participatory framework – speakers and attendees come to engage: to listen, to learn and to contribute. It is an experience designed for the robust flow of ideas, a shared sense of purpose, and the fostering of collaborative relationships. The objective is to support farmers and ranchers with cooperation from the food and fiber industries to bring about a regenerative revolution in the agriculture system. By turning our attention to the ground beneath our collective feet, we can grow more nutritious and health enhancing food through carbon draw down and mitigate the effects of climate change.

The Regenerative Earth Summit: Food + Climate + Culture will build a foundation for community and action. It will blend the necessary and important academic underpinnings and the real-world application of principles and practices in farming, ranching, land management, food production and distribution and climate action. It will span from local to global. The Summit is designed as a participatory framework – speakers and attendees come to engage: to listen, to learn and to contribute.
